The Charles W. Selberling House was built in 1913 as the residence for one of Akron's most prominent industrialists. It is located in the Highland Park area on Akron's west side, where many of the city's industrialists and leaders built their mansions during the early 20th-century era of Akron's great rubber boom.

Rectangular in plan, the massive 2-1/2 story house was constructed of red brick, laid in a double-runner Flemish bond pattern, over a steel frame. A basically symmetrical facade displays a central triabented entry with Tuscan pilasters and columns supporting a classical pediment. The paired entry doors, originally recessed, were replaced in the 1960s and are to be restored to their original appearance in 1993. Double-hung 8/8 windows with shutters are evenly spaced along the facade. Side-gabled 2-1/2 story wings extend from both ends of the house; both wings are set back, with single story sections extending forward to the main facade. The truncated side-gable slate roof of the main block supports three evenly spaced round arch dormers and terminates in a pair of prominent bridge chimneys, with single dormers over the wings. Wide box eaves are denticulated, and the roof is surmounted by cresting. A large, gabled central bay projects from the rear facade and features a distinctive port-cochere, supported by Tuscan columns, over the rear entry.

The interior of the Selberling House is also distinctive, retaining most of its original character and detail with oak and walnut floors and mahogany trim. Seventeen of the original eighteen fireplaces still remain, along with wainscoting, panel doors, staircases, molded plaster ceilings, and crown moldings. The "woven linen" carving over the fireplace in the Tudor style den was reportedly executed by the same artist employed for similar work at Stan Hywet, the National Historic Landmark residence of Charles' brother Frank. Pedestal sinks, tubs, tilework, and other fittings have been preserved in the bathrooms. The third floor servants' quarters also retain a high degree of integrity, displaying maple floors, original fireplace, and built-in drawers and cupboards.

Other than the front doors, the only notable alterations have been an addition to the east wing (date unknown, but early) that is barely discernible, and the brick infill of a portion of the one-story "garden room" on the west wing. A fountain at the rear of this room was also removed, but the marble floor does remain.

The driveway entrance off Maplewood Avenue is demarcated by stone-capped brick walls terminating in two piers topped with decorative stone urns. (Contributing structure)

State significance of property, and justify criteria, criteria considerations, and areas and periods of significance noted above.

The Charles W. Seiberling House is significant under Criterion B for its association with Charles Seiberling, one of Akron's foremost industrialists and civic leaders; and under Criterion C as an outstanding example of the Georgian Revival style of architecture.

Following college at Oberlin, Charles W. Seiberling (born Jan. 26, 1861) entered working life in several of his father's companies, becoming superintendent of the J.F. Seiberling Co. in 1883 and continuing in that position until 1895. In 1898, with his brother Frank, Charles was co-founder of the Goodyear Tire and Rubber Company, serving as vice-president until 1921 and forming a highly successful business partnership of lifetime duration with Frank. Under their control, Goodyear was developed into the world's largest manufacturer of auto tires and other rubber products. However, as a result of an economic downturn in 1920, the Seiberlings were forced to resign from Goodyear in 1921. They immediately founded the Seiberling Rubber Company, a smaller specialty manufacturer. As vice-president and treasurer, Charles was instrumental in that company's success as well, and served until his death in 1946. He was also president of the Thomas Phillips Company a manufacturer of flour sacks, and of the Seiberling Latex Products Co., as well as a director of both the Citizens Savings & Loan Co. and the Macedonia-Northfield Banking Company.

Throughout his professional life, Charles was noted for his strong belief in progressive worker relations, and he contributed significantly to humanizing the industrial workplace. During Goodyear's financial turmoil after World War I, Charles posted 22,000 shares of his own stock to protect employee stock investments, and he founded and capitalized the American Industrial Athletic Association to promote worker physical fitness. His community involvement and generosity were described as more than any other citizen in Akron (Kenfield, p. 78). He was founder of the Akron Community Chest (reportedly the third in the U.S.), and at various times was president of the Chamber of Commerce, University Club, Akron Rotary Club, Akron University Endowment Association, and the Akron Chapter of the National Aeronautical Assoc. He was also a trustee of the Akron Children's Hospital, Barberton Citizen's Hospital, YWCA, Akron Colored Community Service League, Better Akron Federation, and Springfield Lake TB Sanatorium; a vice-president and director of the Akron City Club; and a 1928 delegate to the Republican National Convention. In short, he was either an officer or member of the board of directors of virtually every public service organization in the City of Akron. Charles Seiberling "has been called the most popular Akronite... known to more Akron people than any other man in the city" (Kenfield, p. 78).

☑ See continuation sheet
The Charles Seiberling House is also significant as an outstanding example of Georgian Revival design, exhibiting many of the elements that distinguish this style. The symmetrically balanced facade with multipane double-hung sash and an accented central entry typifies Georgian Revival designs. The doorway's decorative pediment supported by pilasters and columns, creating a sense of depth and relief, is a distinguishing element, as are the boxed cornice with dentils, the bay windows seen on the east and rear facades, and the flat-roofed one-story side wings. This house is reportedly the second largest mansion in Akron, behind only Frank Seiberling's Stan Hywet Hall, not of Georgian Revival influence.

Charles Seiberling lived in this house from 1913 until 1922, when he sold it to Michael O'Neal, another of Akron's leading citizens from the turn of the century. Following O'Neal's death in 1927, the O'Neal family gave the house to the Mary Knoll Brothers, a Catholic teaching order. About 1960 it was sold to the Unity Church, which held ownership until the house was purchased recently by its current owner, who has embarked on a program of restoring the house.
